Denise and Winifred decide that these two dimensions are too limiting, so they turn to a more contemporary expanded set of factors, called the

which include

Denise's disciplined behavior versus Winifred's impulsive behavior, or Denise's conformity versus Winifred's imaginative nature, or and Denise's sobriety versus Winifred's sociability, or Checking the research, Denise and Winifred find evidence that these trait factors (are/are not) stable in adulthood, they tend to have a 50 percent rate, they (do/do not) describe personality in various cultures, and they (do/do not) predict other personality attributes, for example, that Denise is a “lark,” or morning type.